It gives me immense pleasure to present the current issue of Clinical Rhinology Journal. Otolaryngology is a rapidly expanding specialty and has evolved into various subspecialties. With ever changing trends and advances in newer techniques, it is imperative to keep abreast with the latest in the field. With every issue, we make a sincere effort to bring forward the experiences from our fellow colleagues all over the country and the world, so that we can develop a wholesome understanding of the subject and enrich our existing knowledge. In this issue we discuss topics ranging from septal abscess, role of mitomycin C in endoscopic DCR, to fungal infections in children. A sustaining motivation throughout this endeavor has been the desire to bring to you the latest and the best in the field. It is with your constant inspiration, encouragement and feedback that the journal has been indexed in a short span of two years. I hope we will be able to maintain the high standards of publication with generous contributions from our readers and continue to bring to you the most original and unique works.
